

Who regulates health and social care professionals?

Who says what a pharmacist can do?

Who monitors a social worker?

Can anyone call themselves a 'registered' nurse?

Who says a doctor is a doctor?

Making sure you receive treatment and care from only those who meet our standards

What do you expect from a health or social care professional?

You expect your doctor, nurse, dentist, social worker and any other health or social care professional to:

- treat you with dignity and respect;
- have the skills and knowledge to treat or care for you; and
- show high standards of behaviour.

You also expect that someone will take action if you are concerned about the standard of treatment or care you have received.

Who makes sure these standards are met?

We are 13 organisations, known as health and social care regulators. We each monitor one or more of the health and social care professions by regulating individual professionals across the UK and making sure they meet these standards.

We were created to protect the public, and to make sure that whenever you see a person who provides health or social care in the UK (whether private or in the NHS) you can be sure they meet our standards. This leaflet tells you about the work we do and how to contact us.

You expect a professional to have the skills and knowledge to provide you with a high level of treatment or care

An important part of our role is making sure that health and social care professionals working in the UK have the skills and knowledge they need to practise. We set the standards for their courses and training.

To make sure you only receive treatment and care from those who meet our standards, we each keep a register. By law, only people who have shown that they meet our standards are allowed onto these registers.

You expect your professional to show high standards of behaviour

Regulators also set the standards of behaviour that members of each profession must keep to. We provide guidance on what is considered to be acceptable behaviour. We treat failure to meet these standards very seriously.

You expect someone will take action if you are concerned about the standard of treatment or care you have received

If you have concerns about the ability or behaviour of the person who cared for you, you may go directly to that person, or their employer. You may be able to get advice from an organisation or service such as a Citizens Advice Bureau, Independent Complaints Advocacy Services, a Community Health Council or a local Patient Advice and Liaison Service.

We can also take action to protect the public. We can investigate complaints about registered workers. If the situation is serious enough, we can remove their right to practise in the relevant country, or countries, of the UK.

Who is registered?

To practise in one of the professions listed, an individual must be registered with the relevant regulator. If they are not registered and still practise, they are breaking the law and they may be prosecuted. Our registers are open to the public. So, if you want to check if a person is registered you can do this either by calling us or by checking on our websites.
